I wish to emphatically urge the Commission to rethink its stance on Net Neutrality. There are few if any compelling arguments against considering ISPs to be common carriers.

Other nations who regulate their carriers in a manner similar to common carriers have seen better pricing, better competition, and better service than anything available in the United States.

Hope that a lack of regulation would spur competition has proven false, and companies routinely orchestrate monopoly deals with cities who hope that the provider will construct additional infrastructure. This does not happen though.

Internet service in the United States is rapidly falling behind the global standard, and that is a shame, considering that our nation is responsible for its creation.

Please reclassify ISPs as common carriers. You will be able to properly regulate them, carry out legislative intent, uphold democratic ideals, and keep to the Commission's mandate.

All of those things are ignored if you stay to your current course. You have a responsibility to your citizens, please uphold that responsibility.
