

7521102244.txt

I believe the internet should stay exactly as it is, open. So many innovations and advancements have come from the fact people all over the world are able to access and share information and ideas. Allowing corporations or a government entity to decide what information is worthy of faster processing is only going to stifle improvements and hinder those deemed unimportant. ISP's and Netflix are both benefiting and profiting from the same entity and the only reason any ISP/Corporation/Govt would want to end an open internet is out of greed, not creating a better world. If this change is made the burden of proof to show malfeasance would be on the oppressed and disenfranchised who would lack the knowledge, technology, time, or funds to undertake such an endeavor. This is the equivalent of giving tax breaks to multi-billion dollar corporations and then expecting them to turn around and utilize those funds for better employee work conditions and benefits instead of giving it to their shareholders. "If it ain't broke don't fix it" and the internet is not currently broken. As is customary in capitalism, someone has just figured out how to exploit a good thing for the benefit of only a few while hindering countless others.