The FCC must take the necessary steps to make broadband networks open, accessible, reliable, and affordable for everyone.

The agency needs to reclassify broadband as a "telecommunications service," calling broadband what it actually is: a service that allows users to transmit the information of their choosing between the points of their choosing. The FCC's existing classification of broadband makes it no different in the eyes of the law than any website or app. That's just silly. The agency must start treating broadband like a communications service and restore its Net Neutrality rules.
