

7521103457.txt

For the first time in human history, we have the ability to communicate from around the world instantaneously. We are able to instantly look up information, from recipes to CPR techniques at the speed of light. All of this is dependent on an open internet. If someone, anyone, gets to pick and choose what works and what doesn't, then it will become a choke hold on human development and education. It would be like if a corporation has complete control over the highway. It's the only highway, and you have to pay to use it. Then if you pay to use it, you have to pay to go different speeds. Then pay for destinations. Where will it end? It will end in the highway being abandoned.

If this goes through, it will lead to the gradual abandonment of the internet. No more instant communication and learning from other people across the globe. No more information at your fingertips. It will be a fearful and ignorant time all over again.