As a teacher in higher education, I'm already disturbed by the degree to which the current and coming generations find out the vast majority of their information online. The thought of an end to net neutrality, and with it the ability for corporate bidding to determine (even more than it already does) what information is or is not available (by which I mean competitive in the information-gathering market, popping up in searches and able to be viewed without excessive delays), terrifies me. The internet is rapidly becoming our culture's brain. Please don't let the "owners" of the neurons control our access to the thoughts and ideas that make up the content of the internet.
