

7521103933.txt

First off, if I heard that a local grocery store were to force suppliers to bribe them to carry that suppliers goods in a store I wouldn't shop at that store. Unfortunately, there aren't nearly as many Internet service providers as there are options to purchase groceries. Since the Internet service provider game doesn't have enough players to give us consumers the options we would desire, you as the FCC should force the providers to provide equal and fair access to the websites on the Internet. The Internet is the worlds greatest computer network. It is the absolute best way to share information and one of the best inventions of our times. If an ISP (Internet Service Provider) is given the option to force information content providers on this network to pay more money to them so they will allow the users of the service appropriate access to the information, then the ISP is in a sense extorting from the customers and content providers. As a customer of an ISP I would like to see that the Internet stays equal and fair for the citizens of our great country. Again, if it came down to it I would simply switch ISP's if they decided to extort money from content providers and their customers, but since there are so few options for ISP's and most are willing to resort to such brigandage it leaves few options for us consumers. As such, you should reclassify broadband Internet services as a telecommunications, or "common carrier" service.