Though the new guidelines put in place to comply with the court ruling are a good step, the best step would be to classify the internet as a common carrier. Although the argument could have been made in the past that the internet was a luxury service, there is no sensible way to make that argument now. Businesses on the internet have an enormous competitive advantage. Individuals on the internet have unprecedented access to information and social connectivity. This has been the case for over a decade, and classification as a common carrier is far overdue. Make the right decision.
