

To the FCC,

The internet is a vital resource for myself and many others, not just for entertainment but for communication, news, employment, and innovation. It permits rapid iteration and change, and allows new technologies and ideas to spread throughout the world. It's essential. It should be classified as such.

Rulings that allow carriers to discriminate against services that they disagree with (or for any reason) by charging for access to a 'fast lane', works against the development of new technologies and ideas. I fundamentally disagree with the proposal to permit this.

The internet should be a dumb pipe. Carriers should not be allowed to decide how fast a specific service is transmitted. An 'Open Internet' must be protected, and permitting carriers to discriminate over traffic is the opposite of this.
