As a young software developer growing up with the Internet, I am alarmed at the advances made both by my government and the free market. We live in an information age, with the Internet the main vessel for the spread of knowledge between ordinary humans. Without enshrined net neutrality, the question of what information I may access comes into play.

With the recent court ruling, it seems as though the only logical means to ensure net neutrality for American citizens is by classifying the Internet as a public utility. I urge you to fight this fight!

I look forward to a day where I can develop a software product delivered over the Internet and have it be able to reach all my fellow Americans; it is my assumption as a technologist that this delivery should be unimpeded by my ISP. As a startup, I may not have the funds to pay for a "fast-lane" charged by a massive Comcast. Why should I as a small business have to pay a tax of sorts to a private company that happened to merge its way into everyone's existence? The Internet must become a protected utility, else this vision of my future (what I know is shared widely) may never be allowed to come to fruition.
