The internet is an integral part of our everyday lives now. It is not a toy or even a luxury but a necessity in our modern lives. It is how we do homework, how we find and apply for jobs, and how we do business. Times are tough and the internet has become the way we can market ourself to employers through website portfolio and blogs. Having big companies control what gets through the search engines on the internet will further cripple the millennial generation who are really trying very hard to make a living and be part of society in this new technological and economically tough age. We need the internet to be neutral for our futures.
