

7521105671.txt

I'm simply writing to voice support for the effort to keep all internet traffic equally provided for regardless of the content or origin.

As it stands right now the major American internet service providers are more than capable of building out the infrastructure to support the growing need for higher speed internet access, but the profit margins aren't high enough to do so and regulations that artificially grant these companies the power to ransom off that higher speed access to paying customers only serves to drive the costs higher to the ordinary citizens ultimately using the service.

In short the regulations that threaten "net neutrality" serve only to strengthen those Internet Service Providers who already own largest portion of internet access to America while significantly weakening the economic viability of the content providers. The proper course of action is to support the best interests of the citizens rather than the corporations.

Sincerely,
Brian Reynolds