

7521106781.txt

The internet is an extremely valuable resource that we should not and cannot have crippled by removing net neutrality. The free and open internet has provided a space where people of all ages can learn and explore areas that were once blocked off to them based on their socioeconomic status or limitations on free time. It allows the a college student in his dorm room to create a website that makes him a multimillionaire because all the bytes to his website were treated equally. However, if net neutrality were to be abolished, ISPs would have the power to charge a premium from anyone who would like to host a server of their own in order to squeeze more money from them. Start-ups would have to have much more capital in order to try to host a website. Further, with 71% of Americans only having access to 2 or less ISPs in their area, competition for faster speeds would be further stiffened.

I, and those of my generation, cannot imagine a future where we will be forced to either pay for the "YouTube package" with our internet to enjoy the max speed we are paying for anyway or find that YouTube has to pay Verizon (as they are doing now) in order to enjoy the max connection I am paying for.

Do not be on the wrong side of history with the removal of net neutrality. The internet was not meant to be cut apart and sold in pieces, it was meant to be shared openly and freely.