Please classify Broadband Internet as a telecommunications service. If it remains not, then we'll have further narrowing of the market, which is honestly bad for any and all businesses. It's also strangling out certain areas of the country which cannot get reliable internet access, as the places that have the best ability to support areas are not being allowed to because their competitors are taking over the net. I'm all for capitalism and industry, especially competitive business, however this is NOT the way to do it.

With the current meta of ISP's, they are not competing over customers, which is the basis of a free market economy, but rather they are competing over who can be the most manipulative over resources. If you think about it, this is monopolization. Like a certain ISP is the only source of the internet, and they allow other ISP's to work through their services, but they only allow their direct customers to have decent access. It's morally wrong, and bad for the economy.
