

7521107621.txt

Good morning,

Net neutrality must be preserved. The internet has created massive wealths of knowledge that have caused a boom in technology and science that has benefited all of mankind. We are now able to communicate with anyone around the world for free, getting instantaneous results from research universities and news corporations. We are also getting live, uncensored results from organizations that blow the whistle on unjust situations and conspiracies. We are able to communicate with family across the globe instantly to say good night even though we're a world apart. And we are able to read entire websites full of knowledge for free.

But if you do not enforce net neutrality, all that we've accomplished becomes endangered. Corporations can easily throttle or charge money towards websites that don't align with their views (e.g. ACLU, news organizations) and websites that are helping society with a massive number of users (e.g. Wikipedia, KhanAcademy). Please view it this way at the very least; if there came a website that blew the whistle on the corruption of a corporation, removing net neutrality allows the ISPs to censor them freely. We don't allow corporations to hide things from the EPA, or from OSHA, or from the DoJ, so why should we allow them the ability to censor the entire world of knowledge and free speech? I'll tell you the answer; we shouldn't.

Thank you for reading. Enforce net neutrality!

v/r,

James J.