I urge the Federal Communications Commission to classify Broadband Internet access as a Telecommunications Service. The internet has fundamentally changed the way Americans work, play, interact, and organize their lives. To allow the establishment of "fast lanes" of preferential information flow is to restrict the free flow of ideas in favor of increased profits for a handful of companies.

Also, please consider the source of the various opinions you're receiving surrounding this issue. How many individual citizens (not corporations) have written the FCC or their Congress members in favor of classifying Broadband Internet access as a Telecommunications Service? And how many have lobbied for the opposing view? Corporate interests should not trump those of the vast majority of private citizens. Remember, the FCC serves the U.S. citizenry, not the business interests of corporations.
