To the good people of the Federal Communications Commission: For years, you've been fighting the good fight to keep net neutrality alive. But recently, it's been looking an awful lot like you're throwing in the towel. What gives, FCC? Did the anti-net neutrality lobbyists finally make an offer that's sufficiently high to buy out your personal integrity? Did they prove once again that anyone, anywhere can be bought? Because I see no other reasonable explanation for why you would throw away everything you've ever done in defense of a free, unfettered internet. So, tell us: how much does your loyalty sell for these days? Because we, the people of the internet, can match that price. Hell, we can DOUBLE it. Just give us a number. Hell, put together a Kickstarter and we'll donate. In exchange, all we ask is that you reclassify broadband internet as a common carrier telecommunications service and keep net neutrality safe. If you want America to prosper, we NEED net neutrality. Otherwise the internet will become no different than cable television, which is basically cancer delivered straight to your home. So please, FCC. Don't give up. We need you now more than ever. The internet is a force for good. It has helped make the world more peaceful, more prosperous, and more democratic. Don't let the greed of a few benighted men undo the greatest achievement of the information age. Save net neutrality. Reclassify broadband internet as a common carrier telecommunications service. Thank you, and godspeed.
