

7521108631.txt

The Internet has become an important facet of everyday life, and should be treated as a utility in terms of regulation so that innovation may continue unhindered by corporate regulations and "fast lane access." The Internet must be classified as a common carrier so that the spirit of creativity and innovation remains in the hands of the people. Net Neutrality is essential to a free people, and allowing corporations to dictate these rules (conveniently in their benefit) is against not only the will of the people, but the very foundations of democracy.