In what is known as the digital age, it frustrates me to no end that I have to waste my time writing a letter to the FCC to explain the basic concepts of access, the freedom of information, innovation, and free market monopolies.

Information is a public good. The free and open transmission of information promotes the general welfare of our nation. Information should not be segregated between those that can afford the tolls and those that cannot. It is to the detriment of our nation to make corporate entities the de facto regulators of what information is more important than other information. That is not in the interests of the public good. The public infrastructure for innovation should not be for sale to the highest bidder. These resources belong to we the people, not the other way around.
