

7521110739.txt

I'm writing briefly in support of net neutrality. The free dissemination of information on the internet is crucial to maintaining an informed public, as well as protecting free enterprise. If internet providers are allowed to control which data is or isn't available (And make no mistake, that is what will occur, through slowing to a crawl the data they do not like.) then they will have all the tools they need to punish competitors and shut down news sites reporting things they don't like. Considering that the internet is a primary news source for many people, this means that the public's view of issues will be warped by the ISP's desires. Considering that, in many areas, ISPs carry functional pseudo-monopolies, where only one provider is available, this means that not even free market competition will prevent this. So please, reclassify broadband to protect it from corporate interest.