

7521111558.txt

In a perfectly competitive markets, rules such as net neutrality are not necessary, because no one would pay for Internet service that provided high-quality access to only the brands affiliated with the ISP. But the market for Internet service is as far from a competitive market as possible. The first step to ensuring that the most important telecommunications service in the world remains efficient and effective is to classify it (rightly) as a telecommunications service. Please protect net neutrality in the Internet.