I am a homeowner, parent, amateur physicist, programmer, and a disabled veteran. Very likely, with time and continued labor on my part, I will become simply a veteran. My recovery has involved steady study, experimentation, careful management of finances, and access to services not constrained by meddlesome greed.

Now, I'm sure somebody at the FCC is getting a really nice kickback to dismantle net neutrality or maybe their friend in an elected position has been promised support. That's nice of the same government that is looking to throw its veterans under the bus, dismantle our social safety net, and seize what little we have by giving the police unmitigated, unquestioned power to commit extortion.

FCC, if you don't protect net neutrality, then I guess the people of this country couldn't do anything about that except to stop using the services spoiled and stop spending through the companies who spoiled them. All we could really do is run these companies out of business, sure, but can you do me a solid? You know, as a US Army veteran?

Explain to my daughter why her homelessness is inevitable because you want to help a small number of people seize everything for themselves. She's only eighteen months old, so you may need to break it down to simple words. Thanks.

Keep up the great work! With people like you around, soon the United States will realize its long held ambition of becoming a dirt poor third world nation. Well, for the overwhelming majority of us anyway (ie, you and yours for generations to come).

Sincerely,

Jeremy P. Harford
