

7521112711.txt

The FCC really needs to consider reclassifying Internet Service Providers under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1996. It is thanks to their current position as essentially-unregulated businesses that most Americans have very little real choice when it comes to Internet service. Without Title II, and under the proposed "fast-lane" rules, mega-corporations like Comcast could artificially and indiscriminately throttle any services they deem as competitive to their own product. How is choking out the little guy fair at all? All fast-lane would accomplish is giving a few more dollars to people who refuse to compete fairly. Thank you for your time.