Net neutrality is essential to keeping data and information flowing without stagnation. It will also help keep the cost down. I'm paying $200/month for TV and internet. I don't have premium channels and I have Comcast's basic internet. Recently, Netflix decided to pay Comcast for faster access to their network. Even more recently, Netflix rate hikes. How much longer until Comcast says they need to raise rates to provide access to content like Netflix? Comcast already wants to double dip by charging content providers for use of what they are already charging consumers to buy. Doing away with net neutrality will only make it easier for companies like Comcast to provide shoddier service and charge more because consumers will have no other choice. That will be price gouging. Where will the FCC be then?
