

7521113738.txt

Currently ISPs, in particular Comcast are classified as content providers rather than utilities, which flies in the face of reason and experience. If Comcast is a content provider so is PG&E (my power company) and EBMUD (my water company), since they both have web sites. The fact that Comcast and other ISPs provide data transmission facilities for their own content is the worst kind of monopoly abuse, of the same kind as when movie studios owned movie theaters and used their ownership to prevent independent films from being shown.

If you hope to have the public retain any respect for the FCC, you will reclassify ISPs as utilities.