

7521114355.txt

Turning over the flow of information to private interests is a bad idea. Protect democracy and innovation by classifying ISPs as common carriers.

Using the same definition that was applied to telephone companies, it is obvious that they should be considered common carriers.

To fail to do so would deteriorate our country's position in the long term, in the name of private interests in the short term.