On the topic of internet neutrality, I firmly believe that the FCC should reclassify broadband internet as a telecommunications service (Title II). Handing power over to service providers (aka middle-men) sounds good from an economic point-of-view but not from the public point-of-view. All you'd be doing by not reclassifying broadband internet service is proving the classic American stereotype that Congress is backed by the big corporations of America and that it is not the people who run the government, it's THEM. Now I was born into a democracy, not a business company. If the latter should be the case then I think it's right to say that the American government is the corrupt entity I've joked about with my friends off to the side during recess and that a major reformation of the government should take place.

Thank you for reading and taking my opinion on this topic
