The fact that ISPs are now charging both consumers and certain web services that they use, such as Netflix, for bandwidth, means that it is now time to classify ISPs as Title II Common Carriers. ISPs should not be allowed to double charge for bandwidth under threat of singling out certain traffic and interfering with it by slowing it down. Allowing ISPs to rob people like that just sets a bad precedent and will only have a negative impact on both the consumers internet experience and the success of upcoming web services. If companies were doing what they are now starting to do years ago, the internet would not be what it is today. Sites like Youtube, Netflix, and the like would have never come into existence! Please side with the consumer and fix this issue rather than siding with big business.
