

7521117925.txt

The current direction taken by the FCC with regard to net neutrality is not in the best interest of the American people and does not align with the intent of "neutrality" as stated in the FCC's mission and strategy. I think an approach better aligned with the values and desires of the people would be to classify ISPs as common carriers and designate broadband internet as a Title II Common Carrier telecommunication service. In many ways ISPs have been acting as and have been treated as common carriers for many years; I think it is appropriate and necessary to reclassify them as such. I encourage you to halt pursuit of the "fast-lane" approach so as to reconsider the merits of common carrier reclassification. Thank you for your effort and consideration.