The broadband internet should properly be classified as a telecommunications (or "Common carrier") service. So that millions of small business (like myself) small presses, help lines and communications networks still have a fair and equal playing field. I don't know what Netflix is paying to major internet providers in order to speed up their services but I'm very sure that my free-cheap operation can't compete with them in order to reach potential costumers.

The economy is NOT doing well enough that we can afford to cut access for hardworking people who telecommute or otherwise use the internet to work by allowing service providers to charge whatever they like for sites to reach consumers and consumers to reach sites.

Seriously. Not a good idea. Please, please, PLEASE - don't do this.
