

7521118487.txt

As a long time network user (fidonet, arpanet, DCTS and finally the internet in its various growth spurts) I find it outrageous that after years of government, academic, opensource and private development, a variety of last mile providers, and ISPs that are latecomers now feel that for their profit models, they have the right to set up tollgates on the internet. This is not being done to further the development, nor is it to try and recupe investments in development since the proponents did none of the basic work that has made this possible. It is simply profi teering and cronyism at it's worst.