Hello!

I have grown up around the internet. I am 18 now, but ever since I first started browsing the internet in about 2001. I found my love of stars, math and physics based on easy Google searches, and access to a plethora of content on the internet. I've also met friends through various forums and backwater places, which for future generations, will be restricted, slower, and ultimately less populated. For both my social and mental skills, I thank the internet's ability to provide for all. I understand this is much more complicated than anyone would hope for with lobbyists up the wazoo, but I believe that almost everyone in this democratic nation would prefer net neutrality over absurd middleman fees.

I wish you all well, and hope net neutrality survives.
