I'm writing to urge you to maintain free and open Internet by reclassifying broadband internet as a telecommunications service. Broadband providers should not be able to extort payment from content providers in order to have their content freely accessed. Nor should they be able to double-dip by charging consumers for access to the internet, then charging content providers to deliver the content those consumers are already paying to access in the first place. In a country that increasingly puts profit above people, I ask that you maintain free and open access to all sites for all people.

Sincerely,

Laurie Carr
