To segregate speeds on an already expensive and therefore financially inefficient internet provision system is not only going to cost consumers more for less than what they are already getting, but you as an entity will be seen as weak and able to succumb to a handful of powerful ISP's. To approve of a ruling further against a fair and open internet access is to perhaps permanently damage the American public's faith of the FCC as a regulatory body.

We have enough regulatory inefficiencies in this country as is. To allow such in the internet age with the internet itself is not only foolhardy, but detrimental to our ability to understand and trust the world/governments and authority that surrounds us as citizens in a globalized world.
