

7521120150.txt

I pay over $50 per month for basic cable broadband access to the internet. I expect that access to be unfettered, allowing me to use, or not use, whatever sites and services that are available on the internet. To think that an ISP could charge additional fees to either the user or the site/service based on content or usage is crazy. They already have limitations on how much bandwidth I can use, now they want more money based on what I do?

It is bad enough that cable companies already have a monopoly based on the town I live in, now they want even more money.

Netflix, Google, etc are already paying their own carriers for access to the internet to serve the information to the users, it is not fair to expect them to pay another carrier even more because they have a popular service.