

7521120545.txt

Classifying ISPs as common carriers is the most important move we can make towards a free and open internet. A plan that does not include this is not a reasonable one and should be rejected. Creating "fast lane" rules will mean that there is a slow lane, and would require more oversight and more regulations, which will create more loopholes. A simpler option that accomplishes what is right, what we all want, is to classify providers of internet service as Title II Telecommunication Services.