Those who pay money for access to the internet should be able to use the internet as they please. We don't need companies like Comcast getting in the way and trying to indirectly control the internet (to turn things in their financial favor) by increasing/decreasing the bandwidth of certain other companies (by which I mean decreasing the bandwidth of their competitors unless their competitors pay them obscene amounts of money). Just because they've already done this with Netflix doesn't mean they've set a precedent that needs to be obeyed at all costs. Plessy v. Ferguson certainly set a precedent, but in retrospect, we can all agree it was a bad idea and was, quite simply, wrong.

Net neutrality is right. Allowing companies to restrict and influence their customers' use of the internet for their own financial gain is wrong.
