As a user of the internet, I am appalled at the FCC's recent decision to end net neutrality rules for online data. Allowing big companies to set up "fast track" lanes for their content to reach internet users without providing any mechanism to increase overall internet speeds means that content created and distributed by other internet users will be slowed down and in some cases will not reach its audience. The free speech of internet users is being made subject to corporate censorship by this ruling. To preserve the rights of internet users, broadband internet must be classified as a broadcast service under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1996.
