

7521121692.txt

It's imperative that you classify these services as common carriers. We can no longer pretend that something as pivotal to much of how people function in the day-to-day (both on business and personal levels) is subject to the mores of these companies. Many other governments have made this move. The US needs to be seen as a leader in Internet technology and services, and classifying these services as common carriers is the only way to achieve that goal.