

Dear Chairman Wheeler: Tim Berners-Lee, founder of the world-wide web, intended the internet to be free with open access for all in perpetuity. This is and continues to be the mission of the internet.

Your discriminatory argument for allowing fast lane internet clients who are able to pay more than others is economic discrimination and is contrary to Berners-Lee stated mission and purpose. By even considering this proposal, you are breaching your duty to protect the public as the head of a federal agency.

Only by rescinding and rejecting any proposals for a "pay for fast lane" will you be upholding the duties of your Office to protect the public and the mission of Tim Berners-Lee.
