Net neutrality principles must not allow for the ability of ISP's to discriminate between different content providers based on their ability to pay more, or inability to do so. This is totally contrary to net neutrality - all websites need to be treated equally, and we need equal speed of access as consumers to their content. President Obama has publicly stated he agrees with the concept of net neutrality.

I believe the internet should be reclassified as a public telecommunications utility and there definitely need to be more competitors in the arena. For our economy to keep up with other first world countries, we need increased competition among service providers - not mergers of corporate giants and monopolies. All internet traffic must be treated equally, and equal in speed and access for innovation to continue. This is what consumers pay their ISP's for, and there should never be a "slow lane" and a "fast lane".
