The FCC should reclassify all broadband providers as common carriers and force them to open their infrastructure to competition just like the FCC forced AT&T to do when it's monopoly on American telephony was broken. The current recommendation amounts to an end to Net Neutrality and should immediately be revised into a reclassification of the broadband internet provider subsidiaries of Verizon, Comcast, AT&T, Cox, etc. into common carriers.

The open/neutral Internet is one of the greatest innovations of human kind and we should be proud that we created the technology to make it possible in the United States. It would be a terrible shame for it's end to happen where it was born.
