Discrimination based on content has no place in a truly open Internet. The rights of the citizen to fair and unfettered access to information must trump an ISP's desire to monetize access to their customers. ISP's are paid to haul bytes of data, not sell access to our citizens to the highest bidder. Protection must be proactive. A vaguely defined set of rules will lead to abuses by ISPs and place the burden of obtaining fairness on the citizens and the courts with no remedy for damages already done.

Please scrap the "fast lane" concept and reclassify ISP's as telecommunications providers, because that's exactly what they are.
