Dear FCC,

I'm Mitchell Daiuto and I live in Indianapolis, IN.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it large entities that have conflicting interests would have the legal right to hinder potential competition.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs could act as the gatekeepers to their subscribers.

The Internet is debatably the most important advancement in recent human history. The Internet is a beautiful thing because it allows all people the right to have a voice, and share opinions and facts that are not always expressed through broadcasting. It reduces the barrier to entry for small innovative companies, which without the Internet wouldn't have a chance due to limited capital. A free and open Internet allows this! And with free reign given to ISPs that are (more often than not) cable television providers, broadcasting companies, and content producers, these already powerful entities will have the legal right to hinder potential competition even further.
