Dear FCC,

I'm Margaret Brown and I live in Washington, DC.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs could act as the gatekeepers to their subscribers.

The Internet is important to me because, as a media professional for a startup nonprofit, I worry that we will be at a disadvantage. We could not have accomplished what we have done in 2 months without unrestricted access to the internet. I worry that companies my size will be locked out without the ability to afford premium service. Additionally, this can do nothing but increase the stratification that already exists with regard to internet access for low-income Americans.
