Dear FCC,

I'm Joshua Lasdin and I live in Lancaster, PA.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs could act as the gatekeepers to their subscribers.

The Internet is important to me because, as a professional web developer, I need to know that there will not be barriers to entry for the new ideas and services that I hope to bring to the marketplace. If we the United States wants to continue allowing people like myself to innovate new and exciting technology and services for the public, we need our internet and it's connections to be competitive with other countries, which it will never be with monopolies like Comcast and Verizon at the wheel of our infrastructure. It is your responsibility and reason for existence to enforce an Internet that encourages great strides in innovation. Do your job.
