

7521128265.txt

As a video and film professional, I find the news of anti-net-neutrality laws disheartening. I work primarily as a freelancer, and already pay a premium price for access to faster internet, just so that I can upload and download files, and watch high-resolution files, when I need to. To effect this in a way where my provider could change the pricing based on their own criteria could effectively put me out of business. I live in Los Angeles, so many of the sites I use to continue watching content and sharing my professional work would most likely be effected in a negative way by a corporation looking at the bottom line. I am asking, and begging, that we do not go down this path, and instead leave the internet as a set of tools for professionals and consumers to use at their discretion.