ISPs should be classified as common carriers - as a former network engineer and ISP operator I find it unbelievable we are still debating this. ISPs are paid for pipes, regardless of what goes through those pipes, and allowing an ISP to extort the relationship between customers and content providers should be prohibited. TWC and Comcast are big enough that this is something they have the power to do - and they won't be content to just collect points from Netflix, next it will be Amazon, HBO, Hulu, and anyone else that they can profit from. There is absolutely no benefit for consumers here and a ton of benefits for cable cabals.
