

7521128877.txt

I am very disappointed with the ruling today. The mere possibility that ISPs will be able to segregate the internet into those who are willing to pay for faster speeds and those who are not is government sanctioned extortion. It is unacceptable. Though I understand that the chairman of your commission used to have close ties with these companies, it is important to think about the people you are representing on not your personal ties with these companies. A vote to at all hinder net neutrality (which includes creating internet fast lanes) is also a vote to end technological innovation in the United States so that a handful of business owners can get richer. What kind of world are we creating here?