An open, free and equitably accessible internet is required for freedom of information to be in any way meaningful to today's society. Equal access for parties wishing to distribute knowledge should not predicate on the source's willingness or ability to pay to be heard. Anyone seeking information should be able to determine, without the interference of outside factors, what they access and how they reach it. To artificially interfere with, create barriers to, or otherwise prioritize some information or sources over others, is at best manipulative, and at worst, a potential source of abuse of the public's trust.

Our country is great because of the freedoms we enjoy, and restricting or limiting them in any way threatens the foundations of American culture and pride. I, for one, still live here because of the protections and opportunities afforded to me, rather than any other number of countries where such freedoms are not guaranteed, and do not wish to see my nation reduced to a meaningless shell.
