

7521130947.txt

If anyone believe this will not effect the consumer or will simply be a means of "helping" ISPs 'enhance' or 'better' their networks are very wrong. Allowing ISPs to dictate what people can and can not get to with the full speed available to them is another sting to the open web.

This is no different then if you allowed a phone company to dictate how my reception would be while calling one person over another, or worse, calling their competitors.

We should be free to surf how we want, when we want, and at the speeds that we pay for.